Mad Desire to Outdo White Led to Roof Garden Tragedy.

LAVISHED MONEY ON GIRL

Posed as Brave Man to Win Woman's Favors From Despised Rival.

NEW YORK, July 5.—The Press this morning prints the following: With Harry K. Thaw forced to spend Independence Day in his cell in the Tombs and treating fellow-prisoners to innocuous ice cream and cake, instead of to the "wine" and "birds" of Broadway his friends recalled yesterday incidents in the career of the slayer of Stanford White that may go a long way toward clearing the mystery surrounding the motive for the crime. The facts revealed in regard to his prodigality, his relations with Evelyn Nesbit, and his jealous hatred of White showed that for a long time it was Thaw's object to outdo White in spending money and to appear among his companions as a man possessed of nerve. Gay dinners, visits to negro "joints," throwing away

Thaw implored her to remain with him, but she refused and returned to this city in September. On the day after her arrival here a leading florist in the city received a cable message from Thaw ordering that a box of flowers be delivered to the girl every day. Several weeks afterward Thaw returned from abroad rnd tried to renew his relations with the Nesbit girl. He found an obstacle, however, in her mother, who remembered how she had been deserted in London and who refused to permit her daughter to see Thaw. But the Pittsburg man was not to be balked. First he sent a vanload of furniture to the Audubon apartment house, where the girl lived. The furniture was returned by the mother. The next day Thaw had a piano carted to the apartment, and it was en the fifth floor of the building before the mother realized that the marriage would bring her had told friends on the other side that she was disjusted with Thaw, she realized that the marriage would bring he had told friends on the other side that she was disjusted with Thaw, she realized that the marriage would bring he had told friends on the other side that she was disjusted with Thaw, she realized that the marriage would bring he had told friends on the other side that she was disjusted with Thaw, she realized that the marriage would bring he had told friends on the other side that she was disjusted with Thaw in denoting him.

After her return to this country the Nesbit girl took up again with White. On December 24, 1904, he gave a party for her that cost a small fortune. That aroused Thaw, and on New Year night in a private dining-room in Rector's he gave a supper calculated to make White's festivity look like a "ham and" luncheon. One of the guests was Mazie Follette, a close friend of the Nesbit girl. At the height of the merriment Thaw noticed that the Nesbit girl had.

Steady Growth of Hatred. Thaw noticed that the Nesbit girl had a big bouquet of violets. Rushing over to her, he exclaimed, angrily: her, he exclaimed, angrily:

That blackguard White gave you Tenderloin. They entertained their old

"That blackguard White gave you those."

"No, he didn't." she retorted.

Thaw snatched the bouquet and began to chew the violets, casting them one by one from his mouth to the floor. The girl tried to rescue the bouquet. Thaw pushed her and she fell against the table. One of the diners remonstrated with Thaw. The Pittsburg man picked up a plate and hurled it at the man who had interfered. The plate cut the man's face and the party broke up amid hysterical shrieks from the women.

The supper was given by Thaw to celebrate the Nesbit girl's return to him, and after it broke up he shook hands with the guests in the street as if nothing unusual had taken place.

Bravery, "With a String."

After the supper incident Thaw seemed determined to outdo White in everythms. He also assumed an air of bravado and sought to impress his friends with the idea he was no coward. One night Thaw, the Nesbit girl, and two other women made a tour of the negro resorts on the West Side in the Thirtieth streets. When their auto drew up in front of a place in West Thirty-fifth street, in which a murder had been committed several days before. That aligned and said he would show his friends he was not afraid of "the tough niggers." He entered the place and called the negroes vile names. Loud voices were heard, but Thaw came out unharmed.

"See," he said to those in the night Thaw, the Nesbit girl, and two

"But you left all your money and jewels in your coat in the machine," said the Nesbit girl."

"Of course I did," replied Thaw.

"What chance would I have had if those negroes knew I had a lot of money?"

"What chance would I have had if those negroes knew I had a lot of money?"

The couple's courtship—if so legitimate a word may be used—was enlivened with many jealous quarrels. At one time Thaw accused the Nesbit girl of being fond of Jack Barrymore, actor. She had been seen frequently in Barrymore's company, and Thaw became wild with rage. He called Barrymore, actor of his pocket and placed them on a table. Then he arose, flouished a knife and dared any one present to try to get the bills.

Turned to "Frankie" Belmont.

The display of wealth and Thaw's boasting caused the Nesbit girl's "love" to return to him, and for about a month they appeared to be on good terms. Suddenly Thaw became attentative to Frances Belmont, a chorus girl, new Lady Ashburton. That aroused the jealousy of the Nesbit girl, new Lady Ashburton.
